

The home of IBD information & support

IBD in the Workplace

According to your answers – your workplace might benefit from some improvements to better accommodate someone with IBD.

Take a read and share the PDF with your employer so he/she can take steps to better help you with your IBD in the workplace.

Dear Employer,

Employing someone with inflammatory bowel disease (IBD) does not need to be daunting. Most people with IBD lead highly productive and normal lives.

However, certain adjustments in the workplace can help your employee feel more comfortable and work more effectively.

Your employee recently completed the Guts4Life IBD Work Planner tool. This tool takes into account their condition and gives recommendations on how working life can be adjusted to benefit both the employee and the company as a whole.

Facts about IBD

What is IBD?

IBD is a chronic (on-going) condition that affects the bowels. People with IBD may experience flare-ups, where the condition worsens for a period of time, and then periods where their health goes back to normal. For most people – the flare-ups are shorter than the periods of normal health.

Symptoms of IBD include:

- Diarrhoea
- Abdominal pain
- Blood in the stools
- Painful bowel movements

Please note that IBD is not contagious.

Employing someone with IBD

For most people with IBD, managing the condition with lifestyle and medicines means they can lead a normal and productive life.

Simple and effective changes in the workplace can really help your employee cope better with their IBD, and work better and more efficiently.

Below are some suggestions based on your employee's responses on the work planner tool.

Have a read of the below and discuss the next steps with your employee.

Eating & Drinking

Ensure your colleagues are aware that you need to eat regularly at your workstation.

Access to a free water supply is an important aspect of maintaining health. Drinking sufficient fluids is an integral part of any treatment plan for people with IBD. Regular hydration can also boost productivity and concentration in the workplace.

Hours

Ask your employer about flexible working hours - this could be set up to allow you to work less hours when you are feeling less well and make up the time later.

Sometimes a later start can help. Some employers allow their staff to build up time in lieu so they can take it off when they need it.

Also, consider asking your employer about the possibility of working from home, cutting out travelling time and helping you to get more rest when you need it.

If none of these options are viable, it might be that finding a different type of work more suited to your condition would be more appropriate.

Toilet Access

Find out if it is possible to create or move your workstation closer to the toilet facilities (which have adequate privacy). This will help you get to the toilet as and when you need to.

Workplace toilets often lack privacy and sufficient ventilation. In such cases, access to separate and individual facilities such as a disabled toilet, can help to alleviate embarrassment.

Toilet Breaks

Ensure your colleagues are aware of your need for regular toilet breaks, ask one or more colleagues or co-workers to cover you during this time.

This will help you to be supported in your work environment.

Occupational Health

Before you decide on how to implement changes in the workplace, if available discuss with your Human Resources or Occupational Health department, who can also advise you on how best to proceed.

The Guts4Life website contains information for patients and their carers / parents around IBD diagnosis, management and lifestyle. It also offers information for employees and employers to help improve working conditions for people with IBD. For more information please go to: www.guts4life.com

If you have any feedback for us, please complete our feedback form at guts4life.com/feedback

